good font size for resume

Introduction

When you're crafting a resume, the first thing that catches a hiring manager's eye is the overall design. While the content—your achievements, experience, and skills—holds the most weight, the visual presentation can make or break the first impression. One of the most critical design decisions is choosing the good font size for resume. A font that's too small can be hard to read, while one that's too large can look unprofessional and waste valuable space. Striking the right balance is essential for creating a clean, readable, and impactful resume that stands out in a competitive job market.

Why Font Size Matters in a Resume

Font size is more than just a visual preference—it directly affects how recruiters perceive and process your information. A well chosen font size:

- Enhances readability by ensuring that key information can be scanned quickly.
- Conveys professionalism and attention to detail.
- Creates a visual hierarchy, guiding the reader through the most important sections first.
- Improves accessibility, especially for candidates with visual impairments.

In today's digital age, many resumes are first viewed on screens before being printed. Therefore, selecting a good font size for resume that works well both online and offline is crucial.

Factors to Consider When Choosing Font Size

Content Length

A resume's length can influence the font size. If you're limited to a single page, you'll need to fit more information, which may call for a slightly smaller font. Conversely, a two page resume allows for a bit more breathing room.

Target Audience

Different industries have different norms. In creative fields, a slightly larger font can add personality, while in finance or law, a more conservative, smaller font is often preferred.

Print vs. Digital

Resumes are frequently scanned by Applicant Tracking Systems (ATS) before a human ever sees them. Most ATS can read standard font sizes, but if your resume will be printed, you should test how it looks on paper. A font size that looks fine on a screen may appear cramped when printed.

Visual Hierarchy

Using varying font sizes for headings, subheadings, and body text helps create a clear structure. Headings should stand out, but not dominate the page.

Accessibility

Recruiters often skim resumes quickly. A font that's too small can alienate candidates with visual impairments or those reading on mobile devices.

Recommended Font Sizes for Different Resume Sections

Headline & Name

Your name is the first thing recruiters see. A good font size for resumehere should be bold and slightly larger than the body text. Typically, a size of 18–22 points works well.

Contact Information

Keep contact details concise and easy to locate. A size of 10–12 points ensures clarity without taking up too much space.

Summary/Objective

This brief paragraph should be easy to read, so a standard body font size of 11–12 points is ideal.

Work Experience

Use a slightly larger font for job titles (12–14 points) and a standard size for bullet points (10–11 points). This distinction helps recruiters quickly identify your roles.

Education

Maintain consistency with the work experience section: 12–14 points for degree names, 10–11 points for details such as school name and dates.

Skills & Certifications

List these in a compact format. A size of 10–11 points works well for bullet lists, while headings can be 12 points.

Overall Body Text

For the main content—bullet points, descriptions, and other details—stick to 10–12 points. This range balances readability with space efficiency.

Common Mistakes to Avoid

- Using fonts that are too small (below 10 points), making it difficult for recruiters to read.
- Choosing excessively large fonts (above 14 points) for body text, which can appear unprofessional.
- Mixing too many different fonts or font sizes, which creates visual clutter.
- Ignoring print tests and assuming a digital-friendly size will look the same on paper.
- Overlooking accessibility standards, such as not providing enough contrast or using decorative fonts.

Testing Your Resume for Readability

Print Test

Print a copy of your resume on standard 8.5 x 11-inch paper. Check if the text is crisp and whether any sections look cramped or overly spaced.

Digital Test

Open your resume on different devices—desktop, tablet, and mobile—to ensure the font remains legible. Pay special attention to how the document scales on smaller screens.

Feedback Loop

Ask peers or mentors to review your resume. Fresh eyes can spot readability issues you might miss. Consider their suggestions before finalizing the design.

Tools and Resources to Choose the Right Font Size

Word Processors

Microsoft Word, Google Docs, and Pages all allow precise control over font size. Use the built in styles to maintain consistency.

Online Resume Builders

Platforms like Canva, Novoresume, and VisualCV provide templates with recommended font sizes. They often include good font size for resume guidelines in their tutorials.

Templates

Download templates from reputable sources such as LinkedIn Resume Builder or the HR Toolbox. These templates are designed to be ATS friendly and visually balanced.

Font Size Guides

Refer to industry standards—such as the Society for Human Resource Management (SHRM) guidelines—for recommended font ranges. These resources often include sample layouts.

Case Study: Resume Before & After

Below is a comparison of a resume that used a suboptimal font size versus one that adheres to best practices.

- Before: Body text set at 8 points, headings at 12 points, resulting in cramped content.
- After: Body text at 11 points, headings at 13 points, with clear separation between sections.

The revised version is easier to skim and appears more polished, illustrating the impact of proper font sizing.

Conclusion

Choosing the right font size is a foundational step in creating a resume that commands attention and conveys professionalism. A good font size for resumetypically ranges from 10 to 12 points for body text, with slightly larger sizes for headings and your name. By considering factors such as content length, audience, and accessibility, and by testing your design across formats, you can ensure your resume is both visually appealing and easy to read. Remember, the goal is to let your achievements shine without the distraction of poor typography. With the right font size, your resume becomes a powerful tool that opens doors to new opportunities. Happy job hunting!
